Hello,

How is everyone doing today? It's Rob Burgess back with you once again this Wednesday. The rain can just quit it whenever it feels like it, in my opinion.

Have you become a member of NUVO yet? I know I ask a lot, but it's really important. We're relying on you to help us continue our work here. Please sign up if you haven't already. It's only $5 per month.

Thank you to everyone who submitted questions for California Rep. Eric Swalwell, the Democratic presidential candidate who visited Indiana this past weekend. After I sent last week's newsletter, I had a chance to interview him over Skype. I have embedded the video of that interview in the original story I wrote about his visit, and have also published it here. I'm excited for you to check it out, not only because it was a great interview, but because it's the first video I've recorded and published using Skype. We've been working on more audio and video features for you here at NUVO, and I'd love to hear your feedback. I feel it's important to be transparent about process, and also provide news you care about in different formats.

In that same spirit of transparency, I wanted to draw your attention to the story I wrote last evening about the sentencing of Nolan Brewer, who pleaded guilty in federal court to attacking the Shaarey Tefilla synagogue in Carmel last July. In that story, I also included a PDF of the sentencing memorandum in the case, which I received from the office of United States Attorney Josh Minkler. Journalists use these primary-source documents in their reporting all the time, but we mostly don't share them with the public. In sharing documents like this I hope to show give you a better idea of how a story like this comes together. The more we're able to show our work, the better.

That's all for this week!

Thanks,

Rob Burgess
